Three Old Turkic 五臺山讚 Wutaishanzan fragments*

Peter Zieme

Mañjuśrī, the Bodhisattva of Wisdom, is known under several names consisting of five elements equated by F.J. Meier with the mountain 五臺山 Wutaishan having five pikes.¹ Mañjuśrī veneration is known to be affiliated with the holy mountain since at least the fifth century.² E. Lamotte argues that it flourished during the Tang.³ R. Birnbaum who devoted several studies to this topic, saw the important reason for the fact why the Wutaishan became so famous to Buddhists that visitors had visions of Mañjuśrī Bodhisattva here.⁴

Poetic praises of sacred mountains and especially of Mount Wutai were written on many occasions and quite a number is known from Dunhuang. They are written under the title 讚 zan.⁵ Already 饒宗頤 Rao Zongyi made known some parts of this material in Europe.⁶ 杜斗城 Du Doucheng's book⁷ is the most comprehensive study of the related Chinese original texts.

Here I want to introduce translations of the Wutaishanzan into Uighur. These remnants not only show the wide range of Uighur Buddhists' interests, but also a strong interrelationship between the Buddhist cultures of Dunhuang and the Turfan region.

* Herewith I would like to express my thanks to Matsui Dai for his generous help in controlling the Chinese passages as well as Kasai Yukiyo for providing me with a copy of Cartelli's dissertation.

The transliteration of the fragments is followed by an interpretation where I reconstruct the verses by using mostly the text of A.M. Cartelli.

A) The beginning part of a Wutaishanzan translation according to the fragment Ch/U 6956 (T III 62-1004)⁸

On the reverse of the Chinese fragment Ch/U 6956 (T III 62-1004)⁹ there is, as already mentioned in BT XIII,¹⁰ a poem which seems to be a kind of colophon. Following it on the same folio there is the beginning of a translation of the Wutaishanzan^{11, 12}. It belongs to the findings of the third German (Prussian) expedition to the Turfan oasis, but no further informations on place and circumstances are available. None of the lines is complete, and what is preserved of each line, is approximately half of the original text. Thus it is extremely difficult to reconstruct a readable text.

- 14 With two ending strokes, one downwards, the other rightwards. Apparently, the scribe first wrote cyt, and later he added a stroke for '. On the other hand, the correct spelling was indeed cyt, as known from the Avadāna text edited by M. Shōgaito (ll. 256-257):

čitri āsri ārdinilārin etilmiš

činkertü arıg süzök burhanlar uluşı tetmiš

- 15 For yamu cf. ED 934. As final confirming formula beside yamu also čin ol resp. čin ol yamu are in use.

16 This confirms Clauson who stated that “in Uyğ. the word is consistently spelt tonjtar- (or tonjdar-) although töñit- had front vowels in that language and this V[er]b has front vowels everywhere else” (ED 518b).

17 There is no equivalent for aktargalı tonjargalı.

18 Mostly written mančuşiri, thus one may suppose that it is only a lapsus calami.

19 In the Chin. text exclusively 道場 daochang “bodhimaṇḍa(la)”, but here one supposes a variant: taidap can be derived from Chinese 大塔 da ta “large stūpa” (BDJT 925b). Phonetically tai goes back to Chinese da, while Chin. ta had the old pronunciation tāp*, cf. Takata no. 0549.

20 The Chinese text has only “poisonous dragons”, but according to stanza III these are “five hundred”, not preserved in Uighur translation.

21 Comparing the Uighur text with its Chinese origin, it is clear that the translator has chosen zhen ya “to press” = Tu. bas- “id.” in its literal sense, and therefore he had to add an object like tagıg “the mountain” for which there is no trace in Chinese.

B) The final part of another Wutaishanzan translation according to the fragments U 5684a-c³¹

Another manuscript from Toyoq in the Turfan oasis is preserved in the fragments U 5684a-c (T II T). The largest piece, i.e. U 5684a, corresponds to the end of the poem, while it remains unclear how to locate the other two containing only some letters. They are neglected in the reconstruction of the text as I could not locate them exactly.

32 The word böti translating Chin. 駱駝 luo tuo “camel”, normally is spelled pwtw = botu, cf. ED 299, but some examples (esp. in Tatar dialects büti) collected by Ė.V. Severtjan (cf. Severtjan “B”, pp. 198-200), may lead to the assumption that there existed also a front vocalic variant. If Russian bitjug “Lastpferd” is of Turkic origin, it also shows that a front vocalic form like bitü(g)* has to be postulated.

37 The name of the grotto is in the Chin. text “Vajra grotto”, cf. Birnbaum 1989-1990, p. 129 with quote from T. 2099, vol. 51, 1106c12-13: 金剛窟即文殊大宅 “The Diamond Grotto. This is Mañjuśrī’s great dwelling. ...”; Gimello, pp. 130 sqq. 38 HN 134a: 覺護 Jiao Hu, translation of Skt. Buddhapālita or Buddhapāla: 1. name of one of main disciples of Nāgārjuna who founded a branch of the Mādhyamika School; 2. name of a monk from Kabul who came to China in 676. Cf. SH 229: Buddhapāla (Buddhapālita); Hōbōginin Répertoire 238a: Buddhapāli (?), cf. Lamotte, Mañjuśrī, pp. 86-88. Though the Skt. name is sure due to the Chinese translation (but cf. Répertoire!), the Turkic form presents a new riddle. One should expect budapali*, not budapadi as in the text. Probably there was a Middle Indic form on the background we dismiss so far. Cf. R. Birnbaum, Caves, p. 129: “The most famous incident at the Diamond Grotto involved a Kashmiri monk named Buddhapāli. Buddhapāli traveled in China specifically to meet Mañjuśrī at Mount Wu-t’ai, arriving in 676.” For pictorial representation of Buddhapāli(ta)’s encounter with Mañjuśrī cf. Wong 1993, p. 37; Stevenson, pp. 203-222.

39 Here I suppose a misunderstanding given the fact that the above quoted text actually was the “Vorlage”. For 至 zhi “to reach, up to” the translator understood 知 zhi “to know”.

40 In the Chinese text Nārāyaṇa, cf. SH 248a; HN 376b. I cannot explain how the equation of Vajrapāṇi and Nārāyaṇa came into existence. In their German translation of the Vimalakīrtinirdeśasūtra Fischer and Yokota write: “Nārāyaṇa oder Vajrapāṇi eine alte indische Gottheit, im Besitze von ungeheuren Kräften, einem herrlichen Körper und sehr tapfer.” (p. 151). The Turkic text U 5791 is a description of a maṇḍala, one reads (02-05): mantal kulmıš kārğäk [mantal]-niñ içi taşı etigi alku barça kök kārğäk yogaçari yamandaka vaçir-apani-ıg udai şan tag-tın ündürüp kälürüp mantal otur-a-sın-ta turmıš-ın sakınmıš kārğäk “One has to make the maṇḍala (thus): the inner part, the outer part as well as the whole configuration of the [maṇḍala] should be blue. The yogacārin should call the Yamāntaka Vajrapāṇi from Mount Wutaishan and imagine that he is standing in the middle of the maṇḍala.”

“Disciple,

Within the Vajra Grotto is a sweetly flowing stream,

Inside is Buddhapāli, in the midst of meditation.

Once he entered, he stayed for several years,

Nowadays we directly go to Nārāyana.”⁴¹

c Day by day he descends from the mountain and obtains offerings.

d When he returns, he sits in the five-coloured⁴² cloud and ascends.

41 Cartelli, p. 145.

42 ED 566a. G. Clauson could give only one example for tüşrüg: U II 47/75 tüşrük hua çäçäklärig “the t. flowers”. F.W.K. Müller translated it as “wohlfriechend”, Clauson “deposited”, but here it is clearly “coloured”. According to SH 125b the meaning of Chinese 色 se in this context is “colour”. Further examples appear in the Golden Light sūtra: 1) Suv 536/20-537/1 bo dar(a)nıg bir otuz kata sözlöp beş türlüg tüşrüg yip üze bir otuz tügüp < sol> sol oğ [= öğ] öşüninte basun (no Berlin variants) “One should recite this dhāraṇī 21 times and bind it with a five-coloured string on the left forearm!” = (Nobel’s German translation, p. 278) “(soll) er einen fünffarbigen Faden nehmen, den Zauberspruch 21mal rezitieren, 21 Knoten machen und den Faden hinten auf dem linken Vorderarm (befestigen).” (beş türlüg tüşrüg yip = 441a 17 五色線). There is an exact equivalent of se and tüşrüg. 2) Suv 575/1-2 pra kuşatri asturup (no Berlin variants) [tü]kel tüşrüg kulturtı “While hanging up banners and parasols he caused to make (it) [com]pletely coloured.” = 444b16 懸繪幡蓋以莊嚴, without an exact equivalent to tüşrüg) = (Nobel’s German translation, p. 296) “schmückte ihn, indem er Banner und Sonnenschirme anbrachte”. Several examples in the Hsuan Tsang biography, cf. Kahar Barat, p. ↗

C) The beginning of a Chinese Wutaishanzan in Uighur transcription according to U 5335

The beginning of the poem is further provided in transcription in a manuscript written in cursive script and preserved in the Turfan Collection of the BBAW. It consists of a collection of several different Chinese Buddhist works mainly in Uighur script, partly accompanied by a translation. The text of the Wutaishanzan extends from p. 22,1 up to 23,5 of the manuscript U 5335. An extensive study of the whole book is expected by M. Shōgaito and G. Kara.

Conclusion

To be short I only want to stress here that these newly introduced fragments are a further proof for rather close contacts between Turfan and Dunhuang at least in Buddhist belief 44 有緣 you yuan “Those who have the cause, link, or connection, i.e. are influenced by and responsive to the Buddha” (SH 215a).

46 Cartelli, p. 158.

and practice. The Wutaishanzan and related texts are so intermingled with Dunhuang culture that one can conclude that the origins of these Uighur versions were those now known from Dunhuang or similar ones. Further, it becomes more and more evident that the Dunhuang tradition did not find an end with the enclosure of the scriptures' cave, but continued up to the end of Yuan times, especially under the guidance of Uighur Buddhists who later, in the 14th or 15th century came under Muslim pressure.
