The University of Osaka

Catalogue of Pottery Sherds from the 1991 and 1992 Expeditions

Introduction

This report presents data on pottery sherds collected during two expeditions conducted in 1991 and 1992 by Osaka University to Gemiler Ada and Karacaören Ada. It is hoped that the information gleaned from the new Lycian sites, and its comparison with that already published on other sites in the region, may prove of benefit to scholars.

Methodology

The sherds collected were gathered from the ground surface, not from excavations. Moreover, following the 1991 expedition, it was decided that, to facilitate the analysis of our finds, both islands should be divided along their respective mountain ridges into northern and southern sectors.

Classification

The sherds have been classified by ware type, shape, and clay fabric, according to categories employed by the University of Michigan for its excavations at Carthage.¹

Presentation

In all, 327 pieces of pottery were recovered. From amongst these, 69 items were selected on the basis that they appeared to be of greatest potential interest to the scholar. In order of location and year of collection, each item is classified according to physical attributes, following which references are given. Measurements are in centimeters.

Conclusion

On the basis of the pottery finds catalogued above, it is possible to establish a chronology of human activity on Gemiler Ada and Karacaören Ada, as well as to extrapolate its significance in terms of the Byzantine empire. To this end, the 69 sherds have been divided into five ware groups and, further, into ware types,⁴ as follows. Fine Wares, restricted to table use and characterized by the use of a slip or smooth clay, represented by the dish and bowl; Plain Wares, used at the table and for the preparation and storage of food, represented by the basin, bell-shaped cup, bytina, conical cup, small bowl, stamnos and tsoukalion;⁵ Fireproof Cooking Vessels, represented by the tsoukalion; Transport Vessels, represented by the amphora and stamnos; and Storage Vessels, represented by the basin, bytina, pithos, and tsoukalion.

The amphora, basin, bytina, dish, lamp, pithos, shallow bowl and tsoukalion were found on both islands; the bell-shaped bowl, small bowl, stamnos and fusiform vessel only on Karacaören Ada; while the conical cup was found only on Gemiler Ada. Although the number of finds is weighted in favor of Karacaören Ada, a greater variety of ware types was clearly in evidence on Gemiler Ada.

Fine Wares were found on both islands in what appear to have been residential areas. The sherds of two dishes and three shallow bowls are from Gemiler Ada,⁶ while two dishes and a single shallow bowl are from Karacaören Ada.⁷ Looking at these finds on the basis of the north-south division applied to the 1992 expedition, it appears that Fine Wares came only from the north of Gemiler Ada (two shallow bowls),⁸ but from both the north and south of Karacaören Ada (two dishes, one shallow bowl).⁹ Meanwhile, the finds of Plain Wares that were probably intended for table use indicate the presence of a residential area in the north of Gemiler Ada¹⁰ and in the south of Karacaören Ada.¹¹

In terms of color, all but six of the 69 sherds are orange (hue 2.5YR, 5YR, or 7.5YR).¹² Only one of the Fine Ware sherds of a different color (pls. 1, 2),¹³ and most of the Plain Ware sherds are of the same color (pls. 3, 4),¹⁴ with just six of them having a subtly different colored buff (hue 7.5YR or 10YR) (pl. 5).¹⁵ Since only three Fireproof Cooking Vessel sherds (one from Gemiler Ada, two from Karacaören Ada) were found, no color can yet be assigned to this vessel type (pls. 6, 7, 8).¹⁶ Transport Vessel sherds of orange, buff, and grayish brown clay were found: those of orange clay, varying from dull to pale reddish hues, predominated on both islands (pls. 9, 10);¹⁷ those of buff clay (hue 7.5YR or 10YR) were only on Karacaören Ada¹⁸ and were less common (pls. 11, 16); and those of grayish-brown (hue 7.5YR, 10YR)¹⁹ were also found on Gemiler Ada and Karacaören Ada and were the least common (pl. 12). The clay of the Storage Vessels is also orange, and varies from dull to pale hues (pls. 13, 14).²⁰

On the basis that most of the finds were of orange clay, it seems likely that they were made locally, from the locally available orange clay.²¹ This may also be true of the Plain Wares of buff clay²² and the Transport Vessels from Karacaören Ada, since the buff clay from which they are made is of a similar color to the orange clay found on the island. Some of the items in the latter group could, however, have been imported, as it seems likely were all the grayish-brown Transport Vessels from Gemiler Ada and Karacaören Ada. Since the clay has so far been found used only for this group of vessels, the containers could have been produced somewhere else and used to transport oil or wine to the island.

The finds all date from between the third and the thirteenth century. From the earlier part of this time frame, one sherd from Gemiler Ada is from the Late Roman period,²³ as are five from Karacaören Ada.²⁴ 25 sherds from Gemiler Ada are dated between the fourth and the eighth century,²⁵ and 33 from Karacaören Ada between the fourth and seventh century.²⁶ From the later part of our time frame, one sherd from the early ninth century and two from the thirteenth century are from Gemiler Ada, while there are only two sherds from between the twelfth and the thirteenth century from Karacaören Ada.²⁷

Human activity on both islands dates back to the third century, the Late Roman period, with all the finds (except one from Karacaören Ada) dated between either the third and fifth, or the third and sixth century.²⁸ Activity seems to have reached its acme in the Early Byzantine period, since 25 of the 29 sherds from Gemiler Ada are dated between the fourth and eighth century, while 33 of the 40 from Karacaören Ada are dated between the fourth and seventh century.²⁹ The dearth of finds for the following, Middle Byzantine period (one early ninth-century sherd from Gemiler Ada³⁰), leads one to speculate that human activity stopped abruptly toward the end of the Early Byzantine period and that the islands were abandoned in the Middle Byzantine period.³¹ The two sherds from Gemiler Ada³² dated to the thirteenth century and the two from Karacaören Ada dated to the twelfth and thirteenth century, respectively, indicate that the islands were briefly reoccupied in the twelfth or thirteenth century.³³

2. J. W. Hayes proposes the term Late Roman unguentarium in "A New Type of Early Christian Ampulla," BSA 66 (1971), pp. 243-48. There he also suggests a Palestinian source for the ware fabric (ibid. p. 246).
3. According to a Portulan from the early fourteenth century (Mario Sanudo, No. 26), Gemiler Ada was called ixola de Pernixe (Island of the Partridge). This is of interest, since the bird on the rim looks like a partridge. For reference, see K. Kretschmer, Die italienischen Portolane des Mittelalters, Berlin 1909, pp. 202, 220, and W. 33. It is reported that the frescoes in the chapel of Church III have been dated to a later period than the construction of the original basilica. This could indicate that the island was reoccupied, since the later decoration coincides with the later sherd finds.

Postscript

I would like to express my deep gratitude to Professor Chalarambos Bakirtzis for having taken the time to discuss the materials and for the comments and suggestions that helped me evaluate and understand the significance of the finds. The responsibility for any errors is exclusively my own. I am also most grateful to the members and staff of the Archaeological Museum of Fethiye, Lycia, whose kind assistance made it possible for me to benefit from their immense resources. Last but not least, I wish to express my sincere thanks to the Takanashi Scientific Fund, which supported my research in Greece and Turkey in 1993.
